Shamir Criticizes Appearance Of Peres and Hussein on TV

By Glenn Frankel
Washington Post Service

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir denounced as "damaging and harmful" on Friday an appearance by Shimon Peres and King Hussein of Jordan on American television.

The two major parties in Israel sought to assess the impact of the event on the parliamentary election campaign here.

Mr. Peres, who is foreign minister and head of the left-of-center Labor Party, retailed by accusing Mr. Shamir's rightist Likud party of "panicking because Israel now has a partner for peace."

"Every time we make a move toward peace," Mr. Peres said, "the Likud tries to destroy it."

The accusations followed separate but coordinated interviews on an ABC television program Thursday night in which the Jordanian monarch gave a tepid endorsement of peace proposals by Mr. Peres but criticized the prospect of electoral victory by Mr. Shamir as an "absolute disaster."

Should Mr. Shamir win, King Hussein said, "the whole area is threatened and I cannot begin to imagine what the end results will be."

Aides of Mr. Peres said they believed the king's appearance — which was arranged by Mr. Peres's political adviser, Nimrod Novik, reportedly after weeks of negotiations — would help Labor in the election on Nov. 1.

They said it demonstrated to undecided Israeli voters that there was a realistic basis for proposals by Mr. Peres that Israel and a joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation begin negotiations under the auspices of an international Middle East peace conference.

Mr. Peres on Monday proposed elections in the occupied territories to select Palestinians who would negotiate peace with Israel.

"The Israeli voter needs to understand when he goes to the ballot box that we have a real negotiating partner in Hussein," a senior Foreign Ministry official said.

But supporters of Likud predicted that the net political impact for Mr. Peres would be negative because voters would see King Hussein's statement as a political ploy by Labor and as foreign interference in domestic political affairs.

Some analysts said the moves would not be appreciated by an Israeli public still shocked and angered over the suicide car bomb attack on Wednesday that killed seven Israeli soldiers in southern Lebanon.

"This is going to backfire on Labor quite badly," said an official in the prime minister's office. "People don't like it when someone takes a foreign leader, puts words in his mouth and feeds it to the Israeli public. They see through it."

Mr. Shamir himself issued a statement expressing "regret and dismay" over King Hussein's appearance, saying the move was "a sign of a lack of national pride" by Labor.

"It is important to remember that, in the future, King Hussein will be Israel's negotiating partner for peace," the statement said, "and therefore his being pulled into the election campaign is damaging and harmful."

King Hussein called Mr. Peres's proposal of an international conference "a welcome development" and "a step forward." But he refused to commit himself to anything beyond consulting with the Palestine Liberation Organization to determine if it would be interested in reviving the idea of a joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation.

Hostages Threatened After Israeli Air Attacks

By Nora Boustany
Washington Post Service

BEIRUT — Israeli bombers blasted pro-Iranian Hezbollah strongholds in the Syrian-held Bekaa Valley and Palestinian bases in southern Lebanon on Friday, killing nine people and provoking a threat by Islamic Jihad to punish American hostages.

The warning by Islamic Jihad, an Iran-backed group, was accompanied by a photograph of a missing American journalist, Terry A. Anderson, kidnapped in Beirut on March 16, 1985.

"America, the criminal, should know that it will not come out unscathed from this act, especially regarding the fate of hostages we are holding," Islamic Jihad said.

It stated that the United States had a responsibility by association in the air raids because of its close ties to Israel.

"The commission of such folly and aggression will not pass unpunished," Islamic Jihad added.

Israeli planes swooped low over the town of Machghara in the southern Bekaa Valley at mid-morning and struck the main Hezbollah headquarters and a clinic run by the fundamentalists.

The casualty toll was six dead, including a four-year-old boy, and 20 wounded, according to hospital and security sources.

Israel jets also fired rockets at the village of Ain Tineh, near Machghara, missing a Hezbollah office but demolishing a house, witnesses said.

Sheikh Mohammed Hussein Fadlallah, Lebanon's leading Shiite cleric, criticized Israel in a sermon Friday, saying the Lebanese had hit a military target with precision, but the Israelis could do no better than harm civilians.

WORLD BRIEFS

Chinese-U.S. Talks on Satellites Gain

BEIJING (AP) — Chinese and U.S. negotiators agreed Friday to meet two of three conditions set by President Ronald Reagan for the export of two U.S.-made satellites to China for launching, the U.S. Embassy announced.

Negotiations are to resume in November in Washington on the remaining U.S. demand that China's commercial launching services, using the Long March rocket, not use unfair pricing, according to an embassy statement. Mr. Reagan announced Sept. 9 the conditions for granting export licenses for the Communist nation to launch the satellites.

After four days of talks, the two countries agreed on establishing safeguards to protect sensitive technology and on setting China's liability in case of an accident, the statement said without elaboration.

Talks next month will focus on launching services, pricing and capacity as the United States seeks assurances that satellite exports to China will not disrupt the market, the statement said.

Serbs Hold Rallies to Back Milosevic

BELGRADE (AP) — Tens of thousands of Serbs rallied Friday to protest the outcome of a Communist Party meeting this week as the Yugoslav parliament debated a series of economic and constitutional changes. The state news agency, Tanjug, said that at least 75,000 Serbs had attended rallies in Pucarevo, Rama and Velika Plana to support Slobodan Milosevic, the leader of the largest Yugoslav republic who had attended the meeting.

Mr. Milosevic has pledged to contest a Central Committee vote of no confidence in one of his allies, Dusan Knezevic, a Serbian member of the Communist Party's ruling Politburo. The party squabbles have jeopardized the economic and constitutional overhaul to be approved this fall in an effort to stimulate foreign investment, joint ventures and a market-oriented economy.

The 34 constitutional amendments are an interim solution before a new constitution is drafted, possibly for review by the next national congress of the party, in 1990. Mr. Milosevic's campaign for greater Serbian control over its two provinces of Kosovo and Vojvodina has centered on the constitutional changes.

Botha Denounced by Zulu Moderate

JOHANNESBURG (AP) — A moderate Zulu leader whom the government had hoped to draw into negotiations on limited power-sharing denounced President Pieter W. Botha on Friday as a racist who has shamed South Africa.

Chief Mangosuthu Buthelezi's speech in KwaZulu, the black homeland that he governs, was probably his harshest attack ever on Mr. Botha. It suggested that reconciliation between the two was unlikely. Mr. Buthelezi was responding to sharp criticism leveled at him by Mr. Botha during a political speech Thursday night in Beaufort West, near Johannesburg.

"It shames South Africa that the state president has stooped to make personal attacks on me," Chief Buthelezi told the KwaZulu legislature. "This is absolutely disgraceful personality assassination." The government has tried repeatedly in recent years to draw Mr. Buthelezi into negotiations on limited power-sharing with blacks.

Belgium Opposes NATO Arms Move

BRUSSELS (Reuters) — Belgium has decided to oppose NATO moves to push through a quick agreement to modernize the alliance's short-range nuclear weapons, government sources said Friday.

They said the decision, made by a cabinet committee Thursday, placed Belgium behind West Germany and on a collision course with the United States and Britain in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization's most divisive internal debate.

A senior government source said that Belgium was not saying it would never agree to modernization, but was replying to a NATO request to endorse the recommendation to modernize ahead of a meeting next week of NATO defense ministers.

For the Record

A bomb explosion at a South African polling station Friday killed a baby girl and wounded four of her family, the police said. A police spokesman said a Soviet-made magnetic limpet mine was planted in a public toilet at the civic center in the black township of KwaThema, about 12 miles (20 kilometers) east of Johannesburg. (Reuters)

Four men and two women have been found guilty by a Brussels court of staging two separate terrorist bomb campaigns in Belgium that killed two Brussels firemen and caused about $25 million in property damage in 1984 and 1985. (AP)

Italy's highest criminal court has thrown out 13 life sentences for some of Calabria's top Mafia figures and ordered that they be tried again. The court ruled Thursday that the two judges in the first trial had not been formally approved. (AP)

TRAVEL UPDATE

The Italian airline Alitalia was granted a concession Friday to fly from Milan to Oslo, the Norwegian Ministry of Communications announced. The concession was for one year with an option for prolongation on an annual basis, the ministry said. (AP)

Rome is planning to allow cars to circulate only on alternate days depending on their license plates, Mayor Pietro Giubilo said Thursday. The plan, which still must be approved by a city council commission on traffic, would go into effect Dec. 1 through Dec. 23 as an experiment during the busy Christmas period. (AP)

Manila Has Marcos Dilemma

Charging Former Dictator Would Allow Him to Return

By Keith B. Richburg
Washington Post Service

MANILA — As a U.S. grand jury indicted former President Ferdinand E. Marcos on fraud and racketeering charges, the Philippines government has been moving far more cautiously against the deposed dictator because of a political dilemma: Formally charging Mr. Marcos would amount to a virtual invitation for him to come back.

Such is the continuing mystique in the Philippines of the frail and aging former strongman that two years after his ouster, the very mention of his return is enough to put the military on alert, send the cabinet into emergency session, throw the stock market into a panic and spark protest rallies by his band of loyalists.

Although his regime has been widely discredited, so enduring is Mr. Marcos's grip over his followers that they have refused to allow the burial of his mother, Josefa Eralin Marcos, who died May 4. They are demanding that the former president be allowed to return for the funeral, and his body, since moved to Mr. Marcos's staunchly loyal home province of Ilocos Norte, has become a symbolic rallying point for pro-Marcos sentiment.

The widespread fear of a Marcos return also undercuts the continuing fragility of President Corason C. Aquino's government, which is still contending with coup threats from Mr. Marcos's rightist supporters and their allies in the fractious armed forces.

Mrs. Aquino has ruled out allowing Mr. Marcos to return for any reason other than facing criminal charges, citing the fear that his supporters might use a homecoming to renew their largely failed efforts to destabilize her government. She reaffirmed her stance most recently on Oct. 11, according to her press spokesman, Teodoro Benigno, who conceded that "any return of President Marcos to the Philippines at this particular time could set off some kind of political turbulence that will be bad for the country."

The problem for the Aquino government is a constitutional provision prohibiting any Filipino from being criminally tried in his absence. Once Mr. Marcos is formally charged with a crime, he will have the right to return to the Philippines to defend himself.

On the other hand, until criminal charges are filed in Manila, authorities in Switzerland have said they cannot give Philippine investigators access to records on Mr. Marcos's Swiss bank accounts, which are believed to contain more than $1 billion that the former dictator looted from government coffers during his 22-year rule.

Francisco Chavez, the Philippine solicitor-general, said last week that Mr. Marcos would "definitely" be charged, and allowed to come home, within six months. He also said he expected to begin filing criminal charges against some of Mr. Marcos's political cronies even sooner.

But Mr. Chavez said his timetable for filing corruption charges may depend on evidence contained in the Swiss bank records, evidence the Swiss government has said he cannot see until after the criminal charges are lodged.

The government has already filed 39 separate civil suits against Mr. Marcos, seeking a total of $96.7 billion in damages. But with civil suits, defendants do not have an automatic right to be present to face their accusers.

Behind the national fascination with Mr. Marcos are some serious financial concerns: The Aquino government is counting on recovering the billions that he stole to help erase the country's $28 billion foreign debt and fund badly needed social programs and development projects, such as a newly passed agrarian reform act.

ings, Mr. Giuliani said the forfeiture "could add up to a quarter of a billion dollars or more."

The government is also seeking forfeiture of Mr. Khashoggi's condominium at the Olympic Towers in Manhattan as well as bank accounts and any interest he holds in the four buildings.

The U.S. attorney general, Richard L. Thornburgh, noted in a statement that federal racketeering laws permitted him to authorize the return of seized property to the victims of the racketeering enterprise, including the Philippine government, which has filed a separate civil suit seeking to recover the Marcoses' assets.

"This indictment includes allegations of serious illegal conduct engaged in subsequent to the Marcoses' arrival in the United States,"

SOVIET: Sakharov Trip

Council of Ministers permitting the foundation's board to travel abroad led to the change in Mr. Sakharov's status.

They will attend conferences in Washington, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Boston and New York. The trip, which may include a meeting with President Ronald Reagan, is expected to last from Nov. 6 to Nov. 20.

Mr. Sakharov said that his wife, Yelena G. Bonner, would not accompany him on the trip, but that she would later visit the West for medical treatment. Although Mr. Sakharov these days often appears weak and speaks softly and deliberately, he seemed uplifted by the Academy of Sciences' vote.

During the Brezhnev years, when Mr. Sakharov was constantly at odds with the Soviet government, many scientists and officials tried to have him thrown out of the academy.

Now, as a member of its 47-member presidium, Mr. Sakharov will help guide policy for the academy. He will head a department on cosmology, his most recent field of study.

"It's a great honor for me," he said. "Certainly, I'll try to do my job to the best of my capacities."

A Life Devoted To Wealth

The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Adnan Khashoggi, the Saudi businessman indicted Friday on racketeering charges along with Ferdinand and Imelda Marcos, has led an entrepreneurial life dedicated to the accumulation of spectacular wealth and the cultivation of contacts worldwide.

For years, he hopped from continent to continent in his own DC-8. He reportedly had luxury homes in 10 cities. Recently, however, he has also been dogged by controversy and financial problems.

Mr. Khashoggi, 53, is the son of a physician to the Saudi royal family. He has acted as a broker between the West and Saudi Arabia, using his royal connections, and has served as a major conduit for military material bound for Saudi Arabia. In 1986, it was revealed that he had brokered the U.S.-Iraq arms deal that was at the heart of the Iran-outra affair. Mr. Khashoggi claimed that he lost $10 million on the deal.

MONACO: Fairy-Tale Image Fades as Rainier Diversifies the Economy

When we speak about it together," Rainier said. "I tell him, 'You tell me when you feel you're knowledgeable enough and have enough practice. I don't want to hang on.'"

He said he was bothered by the nonstop coverage of his children's personal lives in the press, arguing that it ignored serious endeavors like Caroline's creation of the Monaco Ballet or Albert's interest in the principality's sports life.

"Instead, they say he's chasing such and such a girl," complained Rainier. "They'd rather go into a four-page spread of Caroline changing her bathing suit on a motorboat taken with a long-range lens. In my mind, it's not very interesting."

His youngest daughter, Princess Stephanie, 23, is "haunted by her mother's career and her mother's success," according to Rainier, and she would like to break into acting, too.

"This is a sort of young thing to prove herself," he said of his daughter's efforts to make it as a singer in the United States.

Yet Monaco businessmen say it does no harm to have much of the Western world's press following Stephanie and Albert's romantic antics on the installment plan. As marketing assets, the children keep little Monaco from sinking into the relative obscurity of a Liechtenstein or San Marino.

Those who claim to know Rainier say that his grieving for his wife, the former Grace Kelly, was long and deep and that it is only in the last year that this rather shy man has come out of mourning. He himself acknowledged that he led a lonely life.

"Every person at the top is pretty lonely," he said, pausing. "Most of the solitary part is that you realize you have very few friends. I keep telling the children to be careful when they choose their friends, that finally you will have as many friends as you have fingers on your hands—I mean true friends."

WHALES: Helpless Giants Galvanize World Media

is frightening to me, this media blitz."

As rescuers waited for a slow-moving icebreaking barge being towed by giant helicopters from Prudhoe Bay, some people were asking how much is too much.

"It probably would be tremendously hard to stop now," said Army Master Sergeant Jim Basnight, who is coordinating the Alaska national guard logistics.

Only part of the pressure is attributed to nightly television footage of the stranded whales. Other factors include the Alaska state's inquiries from White House staff and an unprecedented alliance among oil companies, Alaska Army and Air National Guard, the North Slope Borough, federal agencies, Greenpeace and volunteers.

"This thing is just out of hand," said Craig George, a North Slope Borough biologist who has been involved in the rescue since a hunter found the whales two weeks ago. "It's taken on a life of its own."

He said, "In seeing at this point I'm interested in guessing if a rescue effort works."

"There's a whale mania already in place," Mr. George added, "and you put a trapped whale in place, and you get international hysteria. This

A Fairbanks physician, Dr. David Gramman, questioned the "collective caterwauling" by all concerned, calling the rescue attempt an example of misplaced priorities in a depressed Alaskan economy.

"There is an almost overwhelming frustration in seeing enormous expenditures on behalf of these animals while implicitly being forced to watch our patients and friends go without," Dr. Gramman said.

Barrow residents are surprised at the attention being lavished on a natural event, distinguished only by the fact that these whales are trapped where they can be seen instead of at sea. Still, they generally support the effort.

Then there is the apparent irony of saving three gray whales when whalers will attempt to harvest five bowhead whales as a food source when the ice clears. The Barrow community is allowed by the International Whaling Commission to harvest five bowhead whales for subsistence use.

If the gray whales should die or be destroyed as a humane measure, the Eskimos probably would not be able to use the whale meat anyway, Captain Brower said. Half of the meat and blubber is inedible because of barnacles and bacteria, he said, and the oil does not preserve as well as bowhead oil.

Bush Spells Out Ideas to Ban Biological and Chemical Arms

By Paul Taylor
Washington Post Service

TOLEDO, Ohio — George Bush, who as vice-president cast three tie-breaking votes to replenish the U.S. stockpile of chemical weapons, pledged Friday to work with NATO, the Soviet Union and other nations to eliminate such weapons "from the face of the earth."

"If I'm elected president, if I'm remembered for anything, it would be this: a complete and total ban on chemical weapons," the Republican presidential nominee told students at the University of Toledo. "Their destruction forever. That's my solemn mission."

In a tough new TV ad on Friday, the Democratic nominee, Michael S. Dukakis, accused Mr. Bush of airing commercials that were "full of lies." The Associated Press reported.

[Trailing with just 17 days remaining until the election, the Dukakis campaign unveiled its most pointed ads of the year, accusing Mr. Bush of distorting Mr. Dukakis's record on crime and defense.

[Mr. Dukakis set the stage for his new television ad earlier Friday when he said on network talk shows, "I've been subject to attacks and distortions." The American people were "not happy with this campaign," he said, because it had been too negative.

Twice in 1983 and again in 1986, Mr. Bush cast tie-breaking votes in the U.S. Senate to permit the United States to modernize its decaying stockpile of chemical weapons, but his advisers said Friday that there was no inconsistency between those votes and his call for a ban.

"The same principal applies with these weapons as applied with the INF Treaty," said Dennis Ross, a foreign policy adviser to Mr. Bush. "First you modernize, then you eliminate."

After his vote in 1983 in support of the continued production of nerve gas, Mr. Bush noted ruefully that even his own mother complained. But he maintained at the time that the binary chemical weapons he supported were safer and less susceptible to leaking into the environment while in storage than the older chemical weapons they replaced.

In April, 1984, Mr. Bush presented a draft U.S. treaty to eliminate chemical weapons at the United Nations conference on disarmament in Geneva. The issue has languished during the Reagan years, however, in part because policymakers wanted to focus their effort instead on nuclear arms reduction, according to a senior Bush adviser.

"I thought we had relegated the horrors of chemical warfare to the history books," Mr. Bush said. "I thought we had banished forever what we saw only a few months ago: a picture of that mother trying to protect her child, waving her arms against the invisible winds of death — chemical weapons."

Mr. Bush was referring to photographs of a Kurdish mother after Iraqis used chemical weapons in an attack on a Kurdish village this summer.

Mr. Bush proposed the following steps to achieve a ban:

- International consensus against any nation that uses chemical weapons.
- Negotiated on-site inspection on demand of suspicious plants, similar to the verification regime established in the INF Treaty.
- Multilateral or bilateral agreements with the Soviet Union and China to control the spread of ballistic missiles — and, specifically, to keep them out of the hands of terrorist states. Mr. Bush described as "terrifying" the prospect that terrorist states might place chemical weapons on ballistic missiles.
- Continued research and development of a defense against such missiles.

"The last thing we or our allies need at a time when ballistic missiles are proliferating is someone who regards strategic defense as a fraud or a fantasy," Mr. Bush said, apparently referring to his Democratic rival, Mr. Dukakis.

Dukakis Apology to Bush
Mr. Dukakis apologized directly to the vice president on Thursday night for remarks made by a campaign worker about Mr. Bush. The Associated Press reported.

The official, the national field director, Donna Brazile, resigned Thursday after telling reporters that Mr. Bush should "less up," or own up, to rumors involving his personal life.

Mr. Dukakis said Friday that the aide had made "a very serious mistake in judgment."

Candidates Trade Lines At 'Nonpolitical' Feast

Bush and Dukakis Are Given Chance To Show That They Are Not Al Smith

By Maureen Dowd
New York Times Service

NEW YORK — The two men who have been calling each other terrible names sat down together to eat an elegant dinner, separated only by Cardinal John O'Connor. As the band played "I Can't Get Started With You," Vice President George Bush and Michael S. Dukakis on Thursday night began their third face-to-face contest of the political season.

Instead of lecterns, there was rack of lamb. Instead of interrogating panelists, there was a collection of the New York City's leaders in business, government, politics and journalism.

At the city's most famous nonpolitical political event, the Alfred E. Smith Memorial Dinner, the presidential candidates were expected to put issues aside and show some grace, some wit and some white-tie, sartorial style.

The dinner has been a vivid and often controversial New York event since it began in 1945, a year after Smith's death.

With a martini-dry delivery that came across better than many had expected, Mr. Dukakis opened with a jibe about the many states that the vice president claims as residences.

Telling the audience that his wife, Kitty, could not be with him because she was campaigning in Texas, he said there "might" be a Texas on the dais with him.

"Kitty's in a hotel room in Dallas, so I guess she qualifies as a Texan," he said, as the audience laughed.

Mr. Bush, calling the rival he has denounced on the trail "Mike," made fun of his own elite background, saying: "You've seen the portraits of the Mayflower. My people are the ones waving the Bloomingdale's shopping bags."

He said he had not seen so many well-dressed people since "I went to a come-as-you-are-party in Kennebunkport."

With a somewhat wooden delivery of his comic material, he added a staple of American humor — the withering comment of a long-suffering wife.

Recalling how he had practiced his business jokes on her, he said she remarked: "I know Johnny Carson. Johnny Carson's a friend of mine. And George, you're no Johnny Carson."

Mr. Dukakis, too, tried a variation on the now-famous debate barb of Senator Lloyd Bentsen to Senator Dan Quayle on Mr. Quayle's comparing himself to John F. Kennedy.

He began by saying that Al Smith, who in 1928 became the first Roman Catholic to be nominated for president, had been described once as a "pugnacious 5-foot-7 with sloping shoulders and an unimposing appearance."

"And when he ran against Herbert Hoover in 1928, they even called him a liberal," the Massachusetts governor said, mimicking the sneering tone Mr. Bush uses when he says the word liberal.

Mr. Dukakis said: "Now, before the vice president says it, I know I'm not Al Smith."

Even though politicians like Jimmy Carter have fountered at past Al Smith dinners on the shoals of seriousness, the underdog Democrat could not resist trying to score some points on issues.

Concerned that he did not rebut Mr. Bush well enough at the last debate, Mr. Dukakis dispensed with whimsy quickly and turned to crime, drugs, AIDS and the homeless.

While the 2,400 guests at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel were still eating their lemon mousse cake from their $500 plates at the annual fund-raising dinner sponsored by the Roman Catholic archdiocese of New York, the serious Democrat got serious.

Mr. Bush had received a warm welcome in Queens on Thursday when, paying tribute to two New York police officers slain this week, he bashed Mr. Dukakis for being too soft on crime.

So Mr. Dukakis countered:

"When a law enforcement officer is killed in the line of duty, we all die a little bit. And when drugs are the cause — as they almost always seem to be — that grief must be matched by determination."

The vice president's speech, was short on issues but was just as political in its own way. It was stocked with all the patriotic symbols with which Mr. Bush has tried to associate himself, from the Olympic athletes to the American flag.

NBC Drops Steamy Series Ad With Quayle-Like Character

By Peter J. Boyer
New York Times Service

NEW YORK — NBC has stopped broadcasting a promotion for an upcoming sex-and-politics miniseries, "Favorite Son," after Republican officials complained that the ad seemed to be referring to Senator Dan Quayle.

It seemed "an unfortunate coincidence," Lee Atwater, campaign manager for Vice President George Bush, said of the NBC ad, which depicted a fictional young senator who had been selected as a vice-presidential candidate "because he looks good on television."

The six-hour miniseries is to be shown at the end of this month. It features Harry Hamlin as the charismatic senator, chosen for the No. 2 spot by a desperate president whose staff is convinced that he is about to lose the election.

The story, in which the senator's scandalous past comes back to haunt him, is based on a novel by Steve Somner, a former television and movie executive, that was published last year.

About a month ago NBC's promotional staff in Burbank, California, saw what one NBC executive termed "an ironic parallel" between the miniseries and media scrutiny of Mr. Quayle's background, including reports, denied by him, linking him romantically to a female lobbyist.

The resulting promotional ad was designed to exploit the stories, according to a network source who asked not to be identified.

In the ad, Mr. Hamlin's image fills the screen as the narrator says: "He's a handsome, charismatic young senator. He's campaigning for a place in the White House."

One of the aides to the fictional president exclaims, "That's our man!" The president then asks, "You think a man should be vice president because he looks good on television?"

Next there is a sultry shot of a woman in lingerie. "But something in his past could cost him the election," the narrator says.

The ad ends with the narrator proclaiming, "From out of today's headlines comes the most provocative miniseries of the year."

The ad ran on NBC after the first presidential debate and the vice-presidential debate, as well as during the Olympic Games.

Mr. Atwater confirmed that the campaign had complained to NBC. He said he did not doubt that the miniseries itself, which was produced long before Mr. Quayle's nomination, was not about him.

"I think it was a coincidence, but it was an unfortunate coincidence," said it. "We're just grateful that NBC saw it the same way."

East Europe Changing, U.S. Aide Tells NATO

By Paul L. Montgomery
New York Times Service

BRUSSELS — The American deputy secretary of state says that he has found "major institutional change" taking place on his latest trip through Eastern Europe.

But he acknowledged that some Bulgarian human-rights campaigners might have been arrested this week because they tried to meet with him.

The deputy secretary, John C. Whitehead, reported his findings Thursday to the Western allies at NATO headquarters in Brussels.

Mr. Whitehead visited six countries in Eastern Europe this month. It was his sixth visit to the region in the last two years and, he said, his "last swing" in the waning months of the Reagan administration.

"There is change everywhere in Eastern Europe," Mr. Whitehead said at a news conference. "That is the key word of my conclusions." He added: "There is economic change, political change, and social change, and it is moving with great rapidity, particularly rapidly in Hungary and Poland, less rapidly in Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria, and the German Democratic Republic, and hardly at all in Romania.

"But there is major change, major institutional change that is bringing more democracy, more pluralization to those countries, and more free-enterprise economies based on free markets and on individual initiative and on decentralization."

Mr. Whitehead said he found Bulgaria proceeding in a "very sound way" in economic matters but had found "less change in their human-rights performance, but I think that will come."

At the news conference, he did not mention that Edward Genov, a 42-year-old Bulgarian archaeologist who heads the Committee for the Defense of Human Rights in Bulgaria, arrived in Vienna on Wednesday asserting that he had been arrested and put on a train with his wife and two children after making an appointment to see Mr. Whitehead in Sofia.

According to Kyrill Panoff, the director of the Bulgarian Service at

John C. Whitehead

Radio Free Europe in Munich. Mr. Genov and other leaders of the committee were arrested in Bulgaria after Mr. Whitehead arrived.

Mr. Whitehead was asked in Brussels Thursday night why he had omitted mention of the Bulgarian human-rights campaigners in his briefing.

He issued a statement, saying in part: "If these allegations are true, this would be disturbing. As I said in Sofia yesterday at my departure press conference, I made very clear in all my meetings that human rights are very important to Americans. We want to see them protected to the fullest extent."

U.S. Justice Is Treated For Cancer

The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Associate Justice Sandra Day O'Connor of the Supreme Court underwent surgery Friday for breast cancer and is expected to make a "total recovery" and be back on the bench by the end of the month, a court spokeswoman said.

Justice O'Connor, 58, was appointed to the court by President Ronald Reagan in 1981 as the first and only woman Supreme Court justice.

The spokeswoman, Toni House, said the cancer was discovered "in a very early form."

Justice O'Connor issued a brief statement, saying: "The prognosis is for total recovery. I do not anticipate missing any oral arguments."

The court is in a two-week recess and is due to return to the bench Oct. 31.

"I underwent surgery for breast cancer," Justice O'Connor's statement said. "It was found to exist in a very early form and stage."

The statement did not say whether the surgery was for removal of a lump or of the entire breast. There also were no further details on whether the justice will receive any form of continuing treatment.

Justice O'Connor's health, as far as is publicly known, has been good. She underwent an appendectomy in March and she was soon back at work.

Supreme Court justices generally are sparing, at best, in disclosing details of their health.

Her appointment to be a justice ended 191 years of male exclusivity on the high court.

A political and judicial conservative, she has been a champion of states' rights and enhanced police power.

But while she generally sides with the conservative wing of the court, anchored by Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, she has cast important moderate votes in such areas as sex discrimination and affirmative action.

Smart Machines Need Smarter Operators

As automation spreads through U.S. factories, managers are finding that smarter workers are needed to handle the smarter machines. The New York Times reports. The result is called the "informed" plant.

Workers in such factories are given more authority to deal with problems instead of turning to their superiors. To do this, they need, and get, more production information than workers in an earlier era.

"Automation doesn't work when the organizational structure doesn't accept it," said Ramchandran Jaikumar, a professor at Harvard Business School.

General Electric Co. says it intends to replicate, in its more than 300 factories worldwide, its plant in Salisbury, North Carolina, which The Times calls a showcase of worker-driven automation.

GE said the new system has been met with overwhelming approval. Opal Parmel, who runs a stamping machine, said: "You get more work out this way. The majority of people take it as a big opportunity. You're an adult, and you've got to do it."

Several workers left, saying they did not want the additional responsibility. But employee turnover has dropped from 15 percent a year to 6 percent.

Economists say the inevitable result will be more jobs for engineers, managers, scientists, computer experts and other technicians, and fewer for assemblers, laborers, movers and machine setters. Robert Kelly, a professor at Carnegie-Mellon University, calls these highly educated employees "gold collar" workers.

Short Takes

Homosexual activists and several elected officials gathered Thursday at New York City Hall to protest NYNEX Corp.'s refusal to provide a "gay and lesbian organizations" listing in the Yellow Pages telephone book. They said the company's slogan, "It's out there, it's in here," does not apply to them. To dramatize their point, Joan Byron, a martial arts enthusiast, chopped a directory in half with one karate chop. NYNEX had no immediate comment.

After a black fraternity at the University of Mississippi moved into its own house on fraternity row, the house was destroyed by arson Aug. 4. University officials and the student Interfraternity Council organized a drive to raise $20,000 for a new house. An anonymous alumnus offered to underwrite a $100,000 mortgage, and the school offered a $6,000 reward for the arrest and prosecution of the unknown arsonist. Members of white fraternities helped the blacks move into their new home. Stacey Woods, a white junior from Charleston, Mississippi, said, however, that all this was unlikely to lead to integration of the all-white or all-black fraternities and sororities themselves: "Things are heading toward just greater acceptance of black organizations by white organizations," she said. "We're a long way from actual integration."

Of the 4,729 cases of rabies reported in the United States last year, 4,169 were in wild animals, 559 in domestic animals, and only 1 in a human being. Human cases have declined from almost 20 a year to virtually none since 1950 as pet vaccination increased, according to the federal Centers for Disease Control.

Harry's New York Bar in Paris is conducting its traditional U.S. presidential straw vote for its patrons, as is the Harry's branch in Munich. The voting will end, and results will be announced, at 2 P.M. Paris time on Election Day, Nov. 8, well before most polling booths open in the United States. The straw vote has been conducted since 1924 and has accurately picked the winner at each election except 1976, when Harry's customers picked Gerald R. Ford to beat Jimmy Carter.

An Olive Branch in Korea

Another piece of Cold War orthodoxy yielded Tuesday when President Roh Tae Woo of South Korea took the podium at the United Nations. It marked the first time that the leader of South Korea, the only country the United Nations ever went to war to protest, has ever addressed that body. And Mr. Roh used the occasion to launch a courageous and creative diplomatic proposal to bring peace to his peninsula, an effort worthy of the strides he has made toward democracy at home.

He answered by leading his country to successfully hosting the 1988 Olympic Games and by making clear progress toward democracy and human rights. Thus bolstered, Mr. Roh came to the United Nations to plead his case for a conference among the two Koreas and the powers that back them: the United States and Japan, the Soviet Union and China.

Every so often a spectacular case of scientific fraud focuses the U.S. government's attention on how hard it is to keep track of the uses being made of its grant money. In Finland, a Model of What Eastern Europe Could Be

By Dimitri Simes
HELSINKI — With political trouble erupting from the Baltic to the Adriatic, there are signs that the hard-pressed Soviet leadership would like to recast its increasingly troublesome relationship with Eastern Europe. As some Soviet scholars have put it, the region is "pregnant with crisis." An answer to the Soviets' problems — and the West's — may lie in all places, Finland.

time since World War II, there may be a real opportunity for the United States and the Soviets to have meaningful discussions on the region.
To begin with, Moscow's current arrangement with its Warsaw Pact clients is neither beneficial nor sustainable. According to Oleg Bogomolov, director of the Institute of Economics of World Socialist Systems in Moscow, the old Communist model of development no longer works in Eastern Europe. Writing in the newspaper Sovetskaya Kultura, Mr. Bogomolov argues that the old model results in "the aggravation of contradictions which can lead to open crises."

The Bear Still Moves Slowly — Especially on Israel

By A. M. Rosenthal
NEW YORK — In the morning, Soviet delegates talked at the United Nations with wary intensity and thoughtful detail of their vision of the organization — stronger, more active in peace, better prepared to prevent war, a place where all problems from disarmament to the poisoning of the air could find decent solution.

arrogant way, may find it difficult to invite the Soviet Union to a conference on their future as long as Moscow does not even consider them fit to associate with the rest of the world.
At the United Nations, the Soviets privately told the Israelis to be patient, that the "bear takes small steps." That may not convince anybody who has seen a bear cover ground. But it is better than the "good guy-bad guy" theory — constant struggle among Soviet foreign policy makers, with Mikhail Gorbachev and his supporters always fighting their enemies.

Don't Blame the Governor For the Democrats' Fate

By Charles Krauthammer
WASHINGTON — The corpse of the Dukakis campaign is not yet cold, and the spin doctors are already writing elaborate postmortems. For the next few weeks, you will hear the Dukakis swoon attributed to one aspect or another of what Senator Terry Sanford, Democrat of North Carolina, has called "the worst-managed campaign of this century": the fuzzy ads, the shifting themes, the fatal passivity in the face of Republican demagoguery.

with Mr. Bush, his plainness and being called a liberal became embarrassing. By begging for relief from this nasty name-calling, he conceded that liberal is an epithet. He thus yielded without a shot the entire ideological playing field to his opponent.

The Dirty Little Secret of This Campaign

By Anthony Lewis
BOSTON — Class, it has been said, is the dirty little secret of American society. In the 1988 presidential campaign, race is the dirty little secret: a highly significant factor that no one mentions out loud. To say it right out, white fears have a good deal to do with George Bush's strong showing — white fears and white feelings about the Democratic Party's commitment to blacks.

But Mr. Schneider sees race as a broader political factor, underlying the so-called social issues.
"Crime, gun control, law and order: the whole agenda originated in the racial polarization of the late 1960s — black power, violence, the perceived failure of the Great Society. And Bush uses the social issues to define Dukakis as a 1960s liberal."

The politics of racial resentment and fear have played a key role, hurting the Democrats' chances.

100, 75 AND 50 YEARS AGO
1888: Celestial Orchestra
PARIS — A proposition has been made to construct a gigantic aerial orchestra on top of the Eiffel Tower. There are to be Eolian harps, huge gongs and enormous trumpets. The wind, very keen at such an altitude, is to perform upon these instruments day and night. Perfect torrents of harmony are expected to emanate from this celestial orchestra, and to be audible in the remotest corners of Paris.
1913: Royalist Uprising
LISBON — A fresh monarchist movement broke out early this morning (Oct. 21). The object of the rebels was to make an attack on the Ljmoiro prison and release the prisoners and proclaim the restoration of the monarchy. Shortly after two o'clock shots were exchanged between the police and a small group of insurgents, who were forced to surrender. An hour later a band of fifty policemen revolted and attacked the reached by East European leaders. Nor are Warsaw Pact allies, fearful of destabilization, anxious to apply Gorbachev-style reformist solutions to their own difficulties. Only Budapest seems genuinely pleased over the new winds from Moscow.

Soviet officials admit privately that if trends continue, Warsaw Pact governments will be challenged, perhaps violently, by their restive populations. But if there is growing consensus in Moscow that the situation is unacceptable, no agreement exists on an appropriate Soviet response should events get out of control.
Even so, the Kremlin attitude toward the East European search for greater tolerance. Mr. Gorbachev, who once warmly defended the Brezhnev Doctrine, in March signed a joint Soviet-Yugoslav declaration that condemned "the threat or the use of force in any form and the interference in internal affairs of other countries under any pretext whatsoever."
Some influential policy advisers have gone further. As Mr. Bogomolov observed, "Everyone has to follow very strictly the principles of sovereignty, noninterference and mutual respect. The Brezhnev Doctrine is completely unacceptable... It's time to leave our advice to ourselves."
The debate in Moscow over the East European morass may present an opportunity for U.S. diplomacy. In the past, Moscow's deep suspicion of U.S. intentions made such negotiations impossible. But the Soviets are slowly learning to be more open-minded about dealing with the West. Mr. Gorbachev's top international affairs advisers publicly argue that exploring common interests with the West is crucial to perestroika's success. And Mr. Gorbachev's recent shake-up reduced the influence of such conservatives as Yegor Ligachev, who viewed international developments through the prism of East-West confrontation.
Obviously, the West must be reasonable in its expectations of what is possible in Eastern Europe. But the United States has little to lose and much to gain from exploring the outer limits of the new Soviet flexibility. It would not be unduly provocative to tell Moscow that the Cold War can be truly buried only where it was born — in Eastern Europe. The Gorbachev team understands that no stable East-West rapprochement can be reached as long as East European turmoil remains a daily possibility.
The East European attitude favors talking to Moscow without delay. While most Warsaw Pact governments are uneasy about the superpowers discussing their fate, they increasingly want the United States to play a role in the region. Budapest, for instance, quietly appealed to Washington to exert pressure on Romania on behalf of its abused Hungarian minority.
East European elites recognize that to gain greater access to Western credits and technology, they have to demonstrate a modicum of foreign policy independence from Moscow. That, in turn, requires Soviet tolerance for autonomous East European foreign policy initiatives, something that is unlikely to happen without a meeting of the minds between the Kremlin and the White House.
Mr. Gorbachev's current popularity in Eastern Europe allows the Kremlin to take a more positive attitude toward people there who challenge discarded practices of the past. With him in power, there is the unprecedented possibility that the East Europeans, once in control of their own destiny, may view the Soviets as the Finns have — as a neighbor whose interests have to be borne in mind, rather than an occupier — and that they will not turn against the Soviet Union. This chance may be short-lived.
The Finnish precedent should show Moscow that giving up control of Eastern Europe to favor of more liberal arrangements may serve the Soviets well. Talk to Helsinki, a banker and former ambassador to Washington, noted that it is precisely because Finland is "a liberal, democratic, capitalist state that it can offer the Soviet Union a reliable good neighbor and a mutually profitable economic partnership." No relationship with a Communist satellite state is similarly advantageous to the Kremlin.
A historic compromise on Eastern Europe cannot be accomplished through a formal, bilateral U.S.-Soviet deal. It will have to be the outcome of many developments in many places: internal political leanings within Eastern Europe, multilateral arms reductions inside what Mr. Gorbachev likes to call "the common European home," and a climate of increasing East-West trust. But the spirit of Finlandization — and the countercultural and isolationist tendencies spawned by Vietnam and the '60s first made their home in the Democratic Party. The rest is detail.

Hard Lines Melt Away as Paris Mood Shifts

By Suzy Menkes

PARIS — Christian Lacroix's collection was a mess — but a glorious mess, bubbling like a bouillabaisse with imagination and ideas, stuffed with fresh ingredients, rich in its different flavors and sprinkled with spicy colors. It was indigestible, swallowed in a gulp at the end of a long day.

The parts to savor were, surprisingly from a master of color, in quiet shades of pale: the opening outfits when wide-legged jump suits in beige crepe flowed clear and clean under short jackets that were cut on the curve, often with low décolletés and breaking into a burst of color. Curvy cream sweaters, crunchy with crocheted flowers worn over flower-embroidered tulle skirts and pants, were delicious.

Those knits! said Saks' Ellen Saltzman, rolling her eyes heavenward. "Interesting new directions," was her overall comment on the show. There were too many directions, but the general move was downward, with longer skirts and wide pants — which Lacroix first spawned two years ago and everyone has copied. There was also a drift away from the body, with a gently flaring tunic in soft fabrics worn over the pants. It looked ravishing in a wild toreador silk print in corrida colors, as a soft trapeze coat with a panel of smocking at the back, and ethnic style as a honey-colored linen smock with open-work embroidery around the hem. The short skirts all fluttered out into an A-line shape.

As Lacroix's talent matures, it is clear that his importance is not in the line, which seems to have moved so drastically from piqué and pouffes to chiffon and drapes. It is about an attitude of mind, which gives back to women a charm and reticence in dress. Much of that inspiration comes from the past, and there was a quaint, and sometimes fussy, period flavor to dresses with skirts fluting out to a midcalf hem.

The swimwear was inspired by Desurville days, but it looked new in its innocence. Stretchy cotton and lycra in spice-rack colors was draped on the bodice, while the long legs tweaked into a ripple of fabric at the thigh. A second wave of swimsuits followed — an example of the show's muddled staging. They were charming polka-dot playsuits with skating skirts, drapes and flares. That scene flowed into loose jump-suit shorts.

LACROIX'S collections are also about decoration — something that has been out of fashion for so long that it holds an element of surprise. Graceful sundresses with bustier tops had long skirts sprouting heart-shaped ruffled pockets. Layers of ruffles foamed down sleeves of creamy chiffon or made a tickle front to a chiffon dress. The evening embroideries, rich and rare for a ready-to-wear collection, were drawn from the East, effective as the edging of the trapeze-line tunic with pants or fringing the hems of orange pants under a salmon pink redingote jacket. That was a witty twist to the hippie look that Lacroix showed in his last ready-to-wear collection, once again launching a trend.

Lacroix also returned to his own favorite themes, especially for the accessories, which he launches this week as seven separate lines. Those on the runway included ethnic sandals, African-inspired jewelry and deep crowned hats. Thoughtful sandals in a provençal print were delightful.

He also came up with the most stunning knits, by patching prim provençal prints, in sharp colorings, with wild abstract patterns inspired by Picasso and Miró. It was audacious, open and totally successful — one of the moments when the show took fire.

By contrast, Lacroix closed the show with black and midnight blue draped dresses: a trapeze of organza ruffles or bias-cut sheer chiffon, wrapping the hips and flowing into a longer black satin skirt. It was interesting as an intellectual exercise to show what he could do with the little black dress. It did not look as though it came from the heart.

LACROIX: Provençal prints meet Picasso in striking patchwork tunics and pants.

KARL LAGERFELD'S line was long but his show short and snappy. The Jersey knits that opened the collection set the pace, with their leanly sculpted torsos, fitted with seaming to make a comfortable corset.

Colors were fresh and spicy, using navy, ocher and crushed raspberry or breaking up creamy white with stripes of green and red.

This was a sophisticated show that was especially good at night, but also soft and well-proportioned in the day clothes. The first message was the very long skirt. Although wide pants flared out under long fitted jackets, it was the hemlines scraping the ankle that made the statement. These skirts came in light fabrics that moved well, although some were long and slinky.

Shoes were flat. Short skirts still followed the flaring line, for they went under A-line tunics that were almost cut with a long body shape below a pretty neckline.

The silhouette was therefore new — narrow at the shoulder and out in the lower half of the body. But this was gracefully done with Impressionist flower-print skirts floating under belted jackets, or with tea dresses shaped like a redingote. One of these in rose print cotton cloque had "a rose is a rose" scribbled on — a familiar witty Lagerfeld touch in an otherwise restrained collection.

The long A-line, flowing from narrow to wide, will not frighten off women who are accustomed to a wide shoulder line over skinny skirt.

A ladylike feeling ran throughout, emphasized by the models' long, loose hair and by the accessories, which included straw hats and elbow-length gloves — so there was very little flesh on view in the summer collection.

LAGERFELD gave volume to his skirts in different ways and brought in an evening dress that was hulbos in the knees and narrow at the hem, which looked awkward. His attenuated lines worked well with pleats. Navy chiffon pants, caught in tiers of vertical pleats and worn with a creamy crepe blouse, was a perfectly balanced outfit. So were the fine and silky knits in buttercream shades that played with proportions of short over long.

The evening clothes stood out for their luxury, sophistication and light-as-air handling, although black jersey dresses draped into a bustle at the back looked a little heavy for the season. Color was added to the black with vibrant tatin short-sleeved jackets that molded the upper half of the body above the drapes.

Lagerfeld was the first designer to understand le flow, when he was working for Chloe. That knowledge seemed to come back to him for his own label collection, which was pulled together well this season and looked pretty and fluid.

Evening ideas — and there were a lot of good ones — included pique bodices with low décolletés in an odd marriage with shimmering lame skirts, chiffon draped into a toga dress and a very long trapeze-line dress, falling from a narrow shoulder to a wide hemline, in a mix of checkerboard and mosaic prints. That was on the wild side.

LAGERFELD: Long, shapely line.

Trans-Atlantic Love Blossoms Again

By Nina Hyde

PARIS — It is like a love affair that has been put on hold. The American devotion to European designer clothes, which has carried on for more than 20 years, has been curbed in recent seasons. While Americans have remained faithful to some of the old-timers like Chanel, Emanuel Ungaro and Giorgio Armani — fashion houses which never depart wildly from their signature style — other houses have felt the numb where it hurts the most, in the pocketbook.

As a result, many designers are courting American business in their new collections with more reasonable styling and closer attention to inherent value.

Even Yves Saint Laurent, who has had the most long-lasting and devoted fans but for a period had a falling out with them while he strayed from the familiar spirit of Saint Laurent designs, is back to wooing his American clientele.

"Now with the competition from American designers and the stores' private label clothes, European products have to be very good, very well made and competitively priced," said YSL's Joy Hendricks. "If the product is good it sells," she added.

Apparently their new approach is working. In the recent season and the one before, Saint Laurent's ready-to-wear business is ahead by an impressive 10 percent. Even their couture business is ahead. When the couture collection was shown in New York this summer — and whoppingly applauded — along with the usual followers were five Americans unknown to the house who spent sizable sums of money.

With prices escalating because of the weak dollar and the increased cost in European fabric, some women are deciding "that it is almost anti-chic to spend so much money on clothes," said Bernie Ozer of the Associated Merchandising Corp., which advises more stores than any other organization.

He finds that, as stores have become more cautious about their purchases, they are also more demanding of on-time deliveries. "No more laissez-faire," he said.

Many designers have increased their volume of business by opening their own stores in the United States. For some, like Rodier and Céline, according to Ozer, it has helped their business by simply responding to a demand for a more youthful look in their styling.

But for others, like Chanel and Ungaro, it has enhanced their business without hurting the stores that carry their lines. "We overlap on styles," said Ellen Saltzman of Saks Fifth Avenue, "but we offer the customer head-to-toe shopping, which makes a major difference."

Kitty d'Alessio of Chanel added that it is also a boon to the designers. "I think it also prompts stores that carry Chanel to see a vast variety of styles they never considered buying from Chanel, what will sell is these clothes that are carried in depth," she said.

Saks, like other stores, is seeing a major boost from the lower-priced lines of the top designers. Armani only offers the burgeoning Emporio Armani business at their own boutique in the United States, but the lower-priced Mani line is enhancing the already strong Armani sales across the country.

Sola Donna is a spinoff from Ungaro, Ferré 001 a highly successful new lower-priced line from Gianfranco Ferré, Miss V from Valentino, Jean Muir has a lower-priced line, and Genny is a more commercial version of the Gianni Versace collection. All contribute in a major way to bigger sales of the designers at the top of the heap.

Kalman Rutenstein, vice president and fashion director of Bloomingdale's, notes that Ungaro and Armani are getting stronger, but other lines are falling off. Rutenstein puts part of the blame on an overall flatness in business, as well as increased prices. "For the moment we don't have the discretionary dollars with which to experiment and bring in new lines and new designers, as we have in seasons past," he said. "It's unfortunate, but it is the way it is."

In fact, said Rutenstein, "People who buy these outrageously priced imports don't want to experiment with new names. They want the safety of being familiar with the labels."

There are many American customers, both retail and individual, who are buying American clothes out of pride, supporting the Seventh Avenue designers who are working hard to keep styles interesting and prices down. Ivana Trump, once an important customer of Christian Lacroix, for example, has said she

PARIS — They're called familiarly Ellen and Kal, Dawn and Lynn by the fashion followers who also refer to the top American fashion designers — Geoffrey Beene, Calvin Klein, Oscar de la Renta, Donna Karan and Bill Blass — by their first names, as if they were old schoolmates.

Ellen Saltzman, senior vice president and fashion director of Saks Fifth Avenue, and Kalman Rutenstein, who has the same title at Bloomingdale's, represent an enormous force in fashion retailing because of the size of the organizations for which they work.

Saks will open its 45th store in Tysons II, a shopping center just outside Washington, next week. Bloomingdale's opened its 17th branch in Chicago in September. Both appear at ringside of the fashion runways of the world, often side by side. Their faces are always scrutinized by the rest of the audience in judge's reaction, and members of the press rush up afterward to ask for a quote. Both are good poker players and they are almost always kind.

Dawn Mello and Lynn Manulis have a smaller range, focusing on higher priced clothes. Each carries the title of president. Mello is at Bergdorf-Goodman, which she has run for four years under her direction has sharpened her image as the fashion hot spot in New York.

Manulis learned the fashion business from her mother, Martha Phillips, who is still around to chide and guide her. In her four Martha shops, on Park Avenue and in Trump Tower in New York and in Palm Beach and Bal Harbour in Florida, Manulis believes she sells as much expensive fashion as any store in the United States. A visit from Bill Blass or James Galanos with his collection can result in the sale of over $1 million worth of clothes.

Both Saltzman and Rutenstein are spotters of fashion trends; they do not actually place orders.

"I see myself as the eyes and ears of the store," says Saltzman. "I try to cover as much fashion territory as possible — like a journalist. I try to be where the news is and to judge whether it has commercial possibilities. I probably do not cover as many countries as I should."

On her current trip, she is viewing the collections in Milan, London and Paris. A tall, meticulously groomed woman, she comes by her fashion acumen naturally: her parents were Seventh Avenue dress manufacturers, Frances Fatiky Stein, the designer of accessories for Chanel and under her own name, remembers her with awe when they were both classmates at Smith College. "She always had the right sweater with her plaid skirt and she was always fantastically well put together," says Stein.

After college, Saltzman went to work as a secretary at Czar, a now-defunct fashion magazine, and then moved to Glamour. She opened her own business as a freelance stylist with Harper's Bazaar, Vogue and Saks Fifth Avenue among her clients. In 1975, she became full-time fashion director at Saks.

On her European trips, she usually wears clothes by American designers. Bill, Oscar, Donna, Geoffrey — as well as Anne Klein and Gloria Sachs — are among her favorites. She also wears Gianfranco Ferré, Giorgio Armani and Yves Saint Laurent. She is married to Renny Saltzman, an interior designer, and they have two children. Her daughter, Elizabeth, works for American Vogue.

Her answers to fashion reporters' queries are usually controlled and on the mark. "Totally soft, totally new," she said after the Armani show in Milan earlier this month, which she liked a lot.

KALMAN Rutenstein is usually more ebullient. "A tour de force" was part of his comments after the same Armani show. A jolly, round-faced man, he bears a startling resemblance to Mikhail S. Gorbachev. "I'm excited about fashion," he says. "I love to anticipate what is going to happen next on the runways of the world."

Born in Buffalo, New York, he majored in English literature at Princeton University, then went to Columbia University to earn a master's degree in business administration. It was a time when MBAs were rare in retailing. He began on the lowest rung, on the training squad at Lord & Taylor. He moved through the ranks in 12 years to become merchandise manager, leaving in 1972 to join Saks Fifth Avenue as vice president. After three years, he became president of Bonwit Teller, leaving for his present post in 1975.

Like Saltzman, he sees himself as "the conscience, eyes and ears of the store, responsible for its fashion image." Working on advertising campaigns and display windows, he beams that image to "the customer who thinks young, likes quality and shops a lot." As an example of his forward thinking, he cites the unexpectedly big demand for the new wide-leg pants at the opening of the new Chicago store last month.

He serves as the advance guard for the one or two special promotions with a geographic focus that the store runs each year, charting the territory for the buyers who will follow.

HE helps maintain stable relations between Bloomingdale's and the world's fashion designers. The hardest part of his job is drawing the line between fashion news and salability. "You can always find new things," he says. "But you have to make sure they do not end on the markdown rack — we're in business to make a profit."

Dawn Mello, a willowy blond who wears well the pants suits she favors for Giorgio Armani, Geoffrey Beene and Calvin Klein, has worked in stores since she was 15. She studied at the Modern School of Fashion and Design in her native Boston and at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts. When she came to New York, she took courses at the Fashion Institute of Technology and became an assistant to Betty Dorso, fashion director at B. Altman & Co., whom Mello says "taught me about style—she was into Chanel when everyone else was into waist nippers."

She became fashion director of The May Co. for 11 years before returning to Altman's as vice president. There she worked with Ira Neimark who insisted she join him when he moved to Bergdorf Goodman. They are now building a 30,000 square foot (9,100 square meters) men's store across Fifth Avenue from the main building at 58th Street.

Mello and her buyers evaluate each season's fashion collections, judging their past history as well as their future possibilities. They are willing to support a promising designer while he gets his act together. She also tries to maintain continuity "so a customer won't be jarred by seeing the store veer from one point of view to another."

How does she make her decisions? "Instinct," she says. "If you are out there seeing everything, you are equipped to make a valid judgment."

WHEN LYNN Manulis joined her mother after a theatrical career in radio, television and Broadway, she entered a thriving concern. Martha, as her mother is known, knew some of the country's richest, free-spending women and did not hesitate to tell them what kind of clothes they should wear. Manulis doesn't hesitate either—her customers have come to expect it. They spend $10,000 for a Galanos dress or a Ferré couture style as easily as other women buy jeans.

Like the other retailers, she tries to spot the newest fashion trends, but for her that is not the bottom line. Her main concern, she says, is to find clothes that are flattering for her customers. She is very good at this.

Beads and Sarongs Recall Glory Years of Swinging '60s

AN ETHNIC revival was the strongest story line to come out of the London and Milan showings. Indian saris, sarong skirts and a spectrum of spicy colors recalled those happy hippie years.

When fashion is unsettled, designers often look back—especially in Britain, where nostalgia is endemic and the swinging '60s were the industry's glory years.

Only a very few designers gave the theme a modern twist, although ethnic accessories were imposed with dash at Emporio Armani, and Katharine Hamnett stole her own show in a psychedelic cat suit by Emilio Pucci. Many Italian designers used the sarong wrap to soften their predatory line, and modern-minded Gianni Versace turned it into elegant draped pants.

Romeo Gigli made the best of the Indian summer, by stroking embroideries around the necklines of soft fabrics and taking the one-shoulder sari and its brief bare-midriff top, as the shape of his line. His colorings for his own collection, and especially for Callaghan, were also superb, using the subtle palette of dark reds, gray blues, earth brown, olive and old gold that you might find in a Moghul Indian carpet, rather than the cruder spice market shades sprinkled on by other designers.

The Callaghan collection wandered through Indonesia, knotting turbans in the hair and piling on the beads, yet the show looked so fresh it seemed like new fashion territory.

Rifat Ozbek, voted London's Designer of the Year, also scored a hit with his ethnic collection, because he took a familiar cash and cotton theme, and yet used it only as fabric and decorative embroidery, while keeping his silhouette close to the body.

Ozbek, born in Istanbul in 1954, was, like Gigli, first trained as an architect. He then studied fashion at Saint Martin's School of Art and in 1984 was set up in his own label business by Gulf International, a Swiss-Pakistani company that will also back Britain's Alistair Blair.

The Ozbek collection, now made in Italy, featured a Moroccan blanket print, used for hipster trousers and skinny dresses, caftan stitching on stretch jersey dresses and animal print patches that looked too much like the old throw-it-all-together hippie image. His pants suits, based on soft pajamas, made in Arab striped shirtings, were fun; so were the sarong skirts under taut tunics and bare midriff tops decorated with rickrack braid.

"I hope that people come to me because my clothes are fun, young, sexy and well-made," said Ozbek, after being presented the award by Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, who is unlikely to be seen wearing anything with Indian bells on it.

Who will buy the nouveau hippie look? For the young it is fresh and funky—but expensive at designer level. And aren't a lot of the potential customers going to do what the fashion professionals have been at for the last week: digging out from drawers and closets the mirror-seined scarves, the embroidered belts and Indian shawls from the love generation's prime time?

Trousers — High and Wide — Stage a Comeback

By Aline Mosby

PARIS — Trousers have marched back into the spotlight for autumn and winter in Paris shops after being upstaged briefly by the ruffled mini craze. And this season's dominant styles in les nouveaux pantalons are but distant cousins to the masculine classics of yore.

Besides the usual classic tailored trousers, skintight jersey and shorter treader pants, some new varieties show up this season.

One popular style in boutiques from the Rue du Faubourg Saint Honoré to the Left Bank is high, wide and handsome—soaring up from the waist and falling in ample folds, often paired with short bellop or wrap-around blouson jacket or a longer jacket plus a vast shawl, preferably with ruffled edges.

The sturdy jodhpur has come to the city with country styles in corduroy as well as softer, shaped versions.

Evening trousers, banished during the Kindergarten fluff skirt hysteria, have been revived, both narrow and wide.

The Sonia Rykiel boutique offers some of the best examples of the new wide cuts, with the fabric tucked deftly into folds that lie flat on the abdomen. The zipper fits into the flatness, and the tucks all melt into long softness. The pants are paired with short collarless cardigans or longer jackets.

Claude Montana's wide trousers are a marvel of architecture, curling up high above a snug waist and flowing gracefully to the ankle. The short jackets that bear the unmistakable stamp of Montana feature curved edges or giant shawl collars and slightly padded shoulders. Evening trousers in black gabardine are draped with a puffy black sheer blouse.

"The trousers are selling very quickly," said a saleswoman. "And they're being copied quickly, too."

Yves Saint Laurent, who was the first to show tailored pants suits in his 1964 collections and has never abandoned trousers entirely since, shows black velvet tapered pants and glorious evening trousers that hug the body from waist to mid-hip and then break into wide softness.

"There's a big return to trousers—we've sold a lot, while for some years we didn't sell many," said the YSL boutique manager.

The evening pants are sold with black velvet tops dotted with twinkling rhinestones, short jackets with ruffled peplums or black jackets with red satin lapels and sequined shoulders.

Even Emanuel Ungaro, who shunned trousers in his collections for four years, has included several styles in his current line.

The Kenzo boutique is knee-deep in trousers including jodhpurs in fragile pastels. Enrico Covert's shop features wide gray pants with not one but two tiny jackets, one half red and half gray topped by another in white. Chloé's stunning wide trousers in forest green with matching vest and butter yellow satin blouse are topped by a short pink coat.

Some of the new wide pants are long and cuffed, but stop above the ankle at Comme des Garçons and Issey Miyake. Jean-Paul Gaultier's ankle pants have amusing suspender-like tops, paired with masculine jackets.

Lanvin's wide black-and-white striped pants are made gracious by a checked blouse and chic draped jacket. Sumptuous black velvet pants, lace blouses and velvet jackets embroidered with pearls look ready for autumn parties.

By historical accounts Gabrielle Chanel was the first Paris couturier to make pants, wide and white, but only to wear them herself in Deauville in 1918. Chanel only once sold trousers, a pipstern-styled evening number in her 1963 custom-made collection.

In the Chanel boutique this season wide black evening pants with a velvet or satin tuxedo stripe are matched up with wrap-around short jackets with a black velvet collar. Other models sparkle with two Chanel gold buttons or a gold chain, worn with black satin and lace blouses.

Marcel Rochas was the first to include trousers for women in his collection in 1923. It was 1960 when Yves Saint Laurent showed tight pants underneath a taffeta evening skirt when he was designing for Christian Dior. Two years later he opened his own salon and made history by showing white silk trousers under his famous pea jacket.

Christian Lacroix's first ready-to-wear trousers also are wide and high-waisted, shown with full-overs in blazing colors or floral prints.

His more expensive deluxe collection stars wide pants in prints of his native southern France, shown with luxurious zippered-up tuxedo jackets.

Guy Laroche shows le smoking outfits plus silver-black lamé narrow pants with a handsome Bordeaux blouse cuffed in black velvet. Smoke-gray trousers and a pink and gray cashmere hooded top dangle from a hanger in Valentino's boutique.

Nina Ricci's wide gray trousers are dressed up by a long ruffled jacket. And Jean-Louis Scherrer went all-out for trousers, from a khaki wool jumpsuit to wide and paper-thin silk numbers for evening.

Christian Dior's black and gray knitted outfit lines up pants, pullover, buttonless jacket and the popular enormous shawl.

After forgetting pants for three years, Karl Lagerfeld joined the rush with high-waisted wide trousers and short jackets with two rows of buttons. Wide black evening pants come with long jackets gleaming with gold metal belts.

Ungaro's checked straight and narrow pants have velvet-edged matching jackets, and black velvet narrow trousers are sold with elegant brocade velvet vests and winsome white tops with high ruffled necklines. There are also superwide checked trousers, echoing the style of Montana and the rest.

But the manager of the Ungaro boutique on Avenue Montaigne did not order the extra wide model. And the other Ungaro boutique in Paris, on the Rue du Faubourg Saint Honoré, avoided all trou-gers. "Oh, we never have trousers here," said a saleswoman.

New Woman Begins Reign Of Curves

By Suzy Menkes

PARIS — The French have a word for the changing style of models we are seeing on the runways. They are called les pulpeuses — a word that defies translation into English. It means literally "pulpy" or "fruity." Pulpeuses are women with curves in all the right places, gently rounded, but never fat. They have luscious skins and radiate a natural healthiness. They are also pretty sexy. The expression is used and understood by all nations who talk with their hands. Describing a pulpeuse requires much cupping of the fingers and shaping an hourglass in the air. Yet the figures drawn are tender and womanly, not sexist vamps. "It means a ripe fruit," says Karl Lagerfeld, when I asked for his English version, "with skin soft as a peach and just ready to eat." "Rounded," said Christian Lacroix.

COMMENTARY

"Girls who are bien en chair, with good skins, but not skinny." "Girls with hips and without collarbones sticking out," says Lacroix's Jean-Jacques Picart.

"Polpasa — it's the same word in Italian," said Valentino, when I threw the challenge out at a Paris dinner party. "It means meaty, women with breasts and thighs."

"Fleshy," said Valentino's business partner, Giancarlo Giammetti. "Like a painting by Ingres."

"A good skin shown off in a décolleté," decided Georgina Brandolini. "Plump," said her father, Prince de Faucigny-Lucinge.

BUT NONE of these words quite expresses in English the new deal on the runways, as girls are suddenly swelling into women and marking the end of the 20-year reign of pin-thin, boyish mannequins.

Fashions in women change over the decades as dramatically as their clothes. It is hard to decide which came first — the bustle or the sway-back derriere; Twiggy or the skimpy-rib '60s sweater. Bosoms were "in" (which meant out) in the Edwardian era, and "out" (or shall we say in) for the flat-chested '20s. The bust was last upheld by the 1950s sweater girls. It shrank along with the miniskirt and was straightened out in the androgynous '80s.

Hips are never quite in fashion. Yet the beaupole models look less and less well beside the new stars: the shapely, dusky Naomi, first promoted, like the pulpeuse Kadbiya, by Yves Saint Laurent.

Models are now working at their figures.

Sarah Kassidy

spending their cash on "breast enhancement." The results of that cosmetic operation are already displayed by the gazelle-like Ethiopian model Iman.

The point of this new look is not that it is sexy or seductive. Models have been gyrating down the runways or prowling across the stage since the big top presentations first began.

Les pulpeuses have bosoms; they have waists and hips and thighs. But they also have a sweet freshness and femininity that reaches back to an innocent era when girls were 18th-century maidens and the French word was first coined.

THE CHANGING style in girls also presages a change in fashion. The silken skins and rounded limbs of the models seem to be dictating to designers the soft drapes and filmy fabrics we are seeing in the opening Paris shows.

It all suggests a New Woman for the 1990s. A brave man might dare to suggest that the latest models are shaped as nature had always intended for woman. And that a pulpeuse by any other name, would seem as sweet.

Designers' Quilt for AIDS Research

A PATCHWORK quilt made from 36 squares created by all the leading Paris designers will be auctioned on Wednesday at a fashion benefit for AIDS research.

The quilt is a poignant symbol of unprecedented solidarity in an industry that feels especially vulnerable. The international fashion community is aware of the dark shadow cast by AIDS over the United States. As Dr. Jacques Leibowitch of France's Cercle des Médecins, and the inspiration for the benefit, says: "It will take one or two decades to assess the damage done."

Christophe Girard, secretary-general of Yves Saint Laurent, and Ariel de Ravenel of Kenzo have been two of the moving forces behind the evening which has been given the title of Coeur Sida — Against AIDS. The organizers hope to raise between one and two million francs for the Cercle des Médecins and Acat-Sida, the French AIDS research association.

The evening takes place on Oct. 26 in the tents installed at the Cour du Louvre for the ready-to-wear collections, which close that day with the YSL show. "The evening is not just about money, it's a symbol," says Girard.

Mugler Images: 'Cruel,' 'Tender'

HIS WOMEN are cruel, or they are tender and naive, but nothing interferes with the laws of their kingdom," says Jack Lang of his friend Thierry Mugler.

York skyscrapers and Mussolini-style perspectives.

The images, conceived by Mugler to illustrate his clothes, are extraordinary, in that the models — frigid Aryan couples in snowy-white suits or Amazonian black girls in molten dresses — are such tiny figures lost in an architectural landscape. Yet their images are the focus of each frame. "Thierry Mugler Photographs," Preface by Jack Lang, Editions du Regard, 350 francs.

A thin blue sky stretches behind the vast panoramas, created by Mugler for his new book of photographs, which he launches Monday. Lang has written a lyrical preface to this "pure and absolute universe" of "arctic icebergs, New land. "It is unbearable to have friends dying. The fashion world has been closely touched. There is a need for the fashion family to be together to show that we care." Frédéric Mitterrand, a television personality and nephew of President François Mitterrand, will preside over the evening. Culture Minister Jack Lang and Health Minister Claude Evin will also be in attendance. A somber red and black decor, inspired by the broken heart poster created by the artist René Gruau, will provide the background for the 80 tables of 10, at 3,000 francs ($485) a place.

Princess's Frock to Be Shown

A MINI-SIZED dress ruffled with organza — the party frock of five-year-old Princess Caroline of Monaco — will be on show in Los Angeles on Friday. Its creator, the elegant and distinguished Hubert de Givenchy, will receive next weekend the Time Life Achievement Award, bestowed at a gala evening at the Beverly Wilshire Hotel and organized by the University of Los Angeles.

Audrey Hepburn, Givenchy's muse and most loyal client, will be president of the fashion gala to raise money for young students in the world of the arts. Givenchy's 35 years of couture, presented in a live fashion show, will include outfits for the Duchess of Windsor and Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis, as well as full-sized creations for Princess Caroline.

A silk scarf by the painter Sol Le Witt and watches and pens by Gae Aulenti, designer of the Musée d'Orsay, have been created for Louis Vuitton along with other works of art which will all be for sale. Vuitton's company president Henry Racanier will unveil this collection at the Museum of Modern Art in Paris on Sunday.

Hackett of London, the gentleman's outfitters who have put a new generation of yuppie English men back into country tweeds, opened in Paris on Friday at 4 Avenue Rapp. It is part of an expansion, which included a first American store in Boston last month, by Jeremy Hackett and Ashley Lloyd-Jennings.

Love Affair Again Blossoms

now would only buy American because she has become an American citizen.

Lord & Taylor continues to have successful promotions of regional American dressing and now Bloomingdale's is showcasing American designs in special promotions as well. Rather than a foreign locale, next spring's Bloomingdale's promotion celebrates the state of California.

"We've run out of countries to focus on," said Rurtenstein with a smile.

But this week in Paris, Bloomingdale's chairman, Marvin Traub, will announce that the store will salute the bicentennial of the French Revolution next fall with a promotion of French fashions.

Yet American customers are turning increasingly to French designer accessories as a way of adding a special look to their attire. Rose Wells, who coined the phrase "total look" 25 years ago, said women are looking more to accessories to supplement their wardrobes.

Wells has tracked European fashion for more than 30 years, first as a buyer and vice president of the biggest group of stores in America. "Many women are adjusting to the change in fashion by changing their shoes and jewelry, adding color and shape to their small handbags," she added.

"Our accessories keep getting better and better," said d'Alessio, until recently head of Chanel in America and now vice chairman for new ventures and special projects. One of the appeals is the range of prices. "You can get a pair of earrings for $100, a scarf for $150, a occasion piece for $200 and a handbag from $400 to $500. There is even a baby Chanel bag, a starter set for the future Chanel customer."

No one understands the importance of accessories better than Christian Lacroix, who, like some others, has never shown a collection that has not been fully accessorized with his uniquely shaped and colored handbags, his amusing hats, his decorated shoes, and his special breed of jewelry and glasses. So now, this season, he is launching seven lines of accessories to be sold alongside his clothes.

While stores consider Lacroix ready-to-wear a "developing" business, Lacroix is not disappointed with his slow start in this area. In fact, he says, it was calculated to go this way.

"We only wanted to sell 20,000 pieces of the first collection and we sold 22,000. Now we want to start off too fast," said Laure du Pavillon, spokesperson for the house.

His next Luxe collection will be made by Genny in Italy, which makes his ready-to-wear line, as a way of curbing costs by about a third, said du Pavillon.

It is not just French or Italian or English designer clothes that American customers seek out. There is a big customer base for the Escada clothes from West Germany, said Saltzman of Saks Fifth Avenue. "It is beautiful quality and has a jazzy look," she said.

Other stores like Saks-Jandel in Washington have success with the German-made Louis Feraud designs "because they are in the same mood as the top designers but, while quality made, at a competitive price," said Ernest Marx, president of Saks-Jandel, import central in Washington.

While some customers have shied away from these imports, there are still plenty who want European designer clothes at almost any price.

"European designers offer a different look than American designers who tend to show clothes that are more clean, modern and less fussy," said Sarah Davies, fashion director for the much-admired, Seattle-based Nordstrom chain. "European styling is often quite dramatic and balances the wardrobe with something unique and special."

At Saks-Jandel in Washington, the import business is better than ever. "Our customers see that not only have American clothes caught up in price with our European clothes because they all use European fabrics, but with European clothes they can have some exclusivity. They are much less likely to see someone showing up in the same dress," said Marx. Some love affairs never end.

ECONOMIC SCENE
Advice for Next President: Listen to the U.S. People

By LEONARD SILK
New York Times Service
NEW YORK — How much does the outlook for the American economy depend on whether George Bush or Michael S. Dukakis is the next president? The Economist, the irreverent British weekly, keeps calling the man who will lead the United States during the next four years "President Bushakis." This implies that, despite apparent differences between the candidates in personality, ideology and style and on taxes, trade, foreign investment, military spending, or whatever, the first post-Reagan administration will be essentially the same, whoever sits in the White House.

One finding: a willingness to accept market values, if rules are fair and victims are helped.

IN THE economic area, they find that the public favors both market and communal values, not one or the other, and the government's job is to avoid a collision between them. This does not imply "equal treatment" for the two values. Most Americans, the authors find, are "pragmatic and realistic" and know that competing with Japan and other countries is rough and will require sacrifices.

Chief Executive Takes Another Gamble

F. Ross Johnson's leveraged buyout plan has put RJR Nabisco into play, raising the possibility that should the attempt fail, he will see his company taken over. And he could be out.

CURRENCY MARKETS

DOLLAR: Currency Slides to Four-Month Lows Against Deutsche Mark

"When the market snuck its toe in the water and didn't get it bitten off, that removed some of the buyers," said Marc Cohen of Republic National Bank of New York.

The dollar opened Friday more than a penny lower than Thursday's close and lost ground throughout the morning session as dealers grew bolder in probing the lower limit.

It found some support at 1.78 DM shortly before midday, but by that time negative momentum had built up and dealers said the decline continued until the session ended.

Rumors that the Bank of Japan has been checking dollar/yen rates this week around the 126.30 yen level had affected the dollar, dealers said.

London Dollar Rates

They added that the falling health of Emperor Hirohito had put added pressure on the yen.

In London trading earlier Friday, the dollar fell to its lowest level in four months against the mark and yen.

The dollar fell to 1.7795 DM from 1.8023 DM on Thursday, and dropped to 126.32 yen from 127.10.

6.1550. The pound gained to $1.7625 from $1.7620.

"Central banks have not shown their hands so far, that's why the dollar is down here," said a dealer at a U.S. bank.

Investors seem to have decided that the risk of inflation is no longer so strong in the United States as to warrant a rise in interest rates that would make dollar assets a better buy.

The dollar's losses in London were less pronounced against the yen, dealers noted.

"The dollar is merely moving toward the lower half of its range," said a head of treasury at a U.S. bank, who put the currency's band at between 1.70 DM and 1.90 DM.

"The desired trading ranges for the dollar as set by the Group of Seven major industrialized nations have never been published. The group includes the United States, Japan, West Germany, Britain, France, Italy and Canada.

The pound was hurt by remarks from the British chancellor of the Exchequer, Nigel Lawson, who said in a speech on Thursday night that he expected Britain's trade deficit to remain high until 1990.

Some dealers took his comment on trade as a preparation for bad news in the September trade deficit data, which is due next Thursday.

Selling in the pound started in the Far East and gained further momentum at the London opening.

Dealers mentioned a large selling order from a U.S. investment bank.

NUCLEAR: 2 European Companies Expect to Build Reactor for Soviets

He added that the companies and the Soviet Union viewed the construction of the reactor as a research project. Industry officials said the plant was expected to be built on the Volga River but the exact site was unknown.

It has not been resolved how much of the contract's total value will go to either West German company, Mr. Breyer said. The Soviet Union has been doing research on high-temperature reactors for several years and wants to take a substantial role in the plant's construction.

Also unresolved is the question of approval by COCOM, the 16-nation Coordinating Committee for Multilateral Export Controls, which governs Western high-technology exports of Communist nations and must approve the reactor sale.

"This type of plant is in the COCOM list and we will need COCOM approval," Mr. Breyer said. "We are guardedly optimistic that we will get it. But reports that we have already received positive indications from COCOM are not accurate. It remains to be resolved."

nuclear power reactors to Romania on the strength of security arrangements designed to prevent them from being used for any purpose other than generating electricity.

The contract will be a joint venture between Siemens and Asea Brown Boveri's West German engineering subsidiary, but will be transferred to HTR GmbH, a new joint-venture company formed by actor in the non-Communist industrial world.

It also comes on the heels of agreements providing the Soviet Union with billions of dollars of credit from West German and British banks, he said, although the West German credits will not be used in financing the reactor project.

"There is clearly a political side to this," Mr. Fetsch said. "The recent developments in East-West trade have been motivated in part by the changing political situation in the Soviet Union and opinions on that vary from nation to nation. And when there is an increase in trade between the European nations and the Soviet Union it always draws criticism from the United States."

approach to advanced-technology sales, COCOM agreed this year to allow the sale of Airbus airliners to East European countries after the exporters provided security guarantees — for example, that all maintenance would be conducted in Western Europe instead of by Soviet bloc engineers.

West Germany's proposed reactor sale could become a test case for conflicting views about how fast and how far the COCOM embargo should be liberalized.

The West German foreign minister, Hans-Dietrich Genscher, has been pressing for drastic cuts in the list of banned technologies in order to help the Soviet Union move faster in its plans for restructuring its economy.

The Reagan administration and some European governments have argued that constraints should be gradually loosened as the West improves its ability to protect highly sensitive technology. So far, they said, the Soviet Union has not changed its military programs in a way that would warrant a major shift in COCOM restrictions.

The Soviet Union's concern for safety after the Chernobyl incident resulted in industrial changes calling for modernization of its nuclear power plants. That program makes it an ideal target market for HTR GmbH, analysts said.

Siemens and Asea Brown Boveri earlier in October, Mr. Bowski said. HTR GmbH will be legally established in Frankfurt in early 1989.

"I signed as expected, the contract certainly represents a success for the nuclear industry and the high-temperature reactor program," Mr. Bowski said.

Analysts said the agreement could represent a major breakthrough, with both financial and political ramifications.

"From a purely business standpoint it has to be seen as extremely positive," said Mark Hawtin, who follows West German companies for Ark Securities Ltd. in London.

"It's the first hard order for a high-temperature reactor, and if it goes well it could lead to very big business in the future."

Peter Fetsch, an economist with Commerzbank AG in Frankfurt called the agreement "a further sign of movement in East-West trade," after a lengthy period of stagnation after Mikhail S. Gorbachev's rise to power.

Mr. Fetsch said the deal could help attract investors for the high-temperature reactor to this."

Mr. Fetsch said. "The recent developments in East-West trade have been motivated in part by the changing political situation in the Soviet Union and opinions on that vary from nation to nation. And when there is an increase in trade between the European nations and the Soviet Union it always draws criticism from the United States."

That criticism is usually over what the United States perceives as overly generous credit terms or transfer of sensitive technology. But Mr. Hawtin said the technology transfer argument seemed spurious.

"If anything, exports and shifts of technology to the Soviet Union have declined recently," he said. "As to freeing up too much technology to the Russians, there isn't really much in the nuclear field that they don't already know about. They have been pursuing their own high-temperature reactor program. What difference is this agreement going to make?"

In a recent move interpreted as signifying a more liberal Western approach to advanced-technology sales, COCOM agreed this year to allow the sale of Airbus airliners to East European countries after the exporters provided security guarantees — for example, that all maintenance would be conducted in Western Europe instead of by Soviet bloc engineers.

LOANS: Lending Spree to Soviet Union Causes Disquiet in Washington

The more than $9 billion of lending indicated over the last 10 days consists of $1.67 billion announced earlier this week in West Germany, $775 million announced by Italian banks, $2.6 billion in a credit agreement that British banks are preparing according to banking sources in London, $2 billion expected from France, as reported in the Paris newspaper Le Monde, and $2 billion expected from Tokyo, according to banking sources there.

An additional $1 billion is also expected from Austria, Switzerland and Middle East investors making bilateral "private placements," according to American banking officials who have followed the transactions.

The loans are known as general purpose or unsecured loans because they are not linked to specific trade transactions.

Roger W. Robinson Jr., a former senior international economic official on the National Security Council, said the total represents nearly a third of the $30 billion the Soviet Union is expected to earn this year in hard currency, chiefly from the sale of oil and gas, arms and gold.

"I question whether the West has yet examined the consequences of allowing the Soviet bloc nations easy access to unsecured Western credit," he told a House banking subcommittee last month.

In addition, Moscow has entered the international securities markets. Twice this year the Soviets have sold bonds in Europe, raising a total of $350 million.

Moscow says it needs the money to produce more consumer goods, including textiles, shoes, food and automobiles. The Soviets are already studying plans to double their automobile production from the present 1.4 million vehicles a year.

The Republican Party's platform has called for an end to such loans, "which provide the Soviet Union with desperately needed hard currency to bolster its weak economy and facilitate illicit Soviet purchase of U.S. technology."

Michael Boskin, an economic adviser to the Bush campaign, has told The Detroit News: "We do see a reason for concern about how these loans could affect our general security situation, and I think we need to take a hard look at this whole situation."

A study on the Soviet Union's global commitments done in 1986 by the Rand Corp., an independent American research center, found that in 1983 Soviet military aid to Libya, Cuba and Vietnam cost Moscow more than $15 billion.

At the same time there is concern about Soviet indebtedness, which and whether, as one congressional aide put it, "this might mean bridge loans in the future not only to Mexico but also the Soviet Union."

MEMORIES AND HALLUCINATIONS: A Memoir

By D.M. Thomas. 195 pages. $18.95. Viking Inc., 40 West 23d Street, New York, N.Y. 10010.

Reviewed by Anthony Storr

D. M. THOMAS leaped to fame in 1981 with the publication of his third novel, "The White Hotel." Although best known as a novelist, he is also a gifted poet who has published no fewer than eight collections of poetry as well as translations of Anna Akhmatova and Pushkin.

Thomas was born into a working-class family in Cornwall in 1925. Although his psychoanalysis suggests that he was a lonely child who was never really part of the family, his parents clearly recognized his gifts and did their best to see that he had opportunities for their fulfillment. At the age of 20, he became an undergraduate at New College, Oxford. One of his tutors was writer and critic John Bayley, whose "charming eccentricity" was clearly an inspiration. A degree in English launched Thomas on his way, and, until success as a writer made any other occupation unnecessary, he taught English literature at Hereford College of Education and elsewhere. When not engaged in chasing his female pupils, he was, one can imagine, a refreshingly unorthodox guide to literature, for which, as he says, he has a passion. This does not prevent him from misquoting the title of Robert Frost's poem, "The Death of the Hired Man."

Thomas's autobiography, like his novels, avoids the use of conventional narrative. Some readers will find it bewildering to be constantly whisked from childhood to adulthood, from Wales to Australia, from Oxford to Washington, without any obvious reason or connecting thread. This apparent inconsequence seems to be based upon free association. Thomas's personal analysis appears as a recurrent intermission throughout the book.

There may be a secret coherence to this narrative which, although it eludes the reader, is obvious to the author and to his psychoanalyst. On the other hand, there may not. Subterranean connections, magical thinking, and inexplicable but significant coincidences jostle together in Thomas's mind. He is also expert at pastiche and mimicry. Readers of "The White Hotel" will recall the accuracy with which he imitated Freud's style of writing letters, an accuracy so remarkable that, so he tells us, Anna Freud demanded to know where he had found them.

They will also remember the accusations of plagiarism which were leveled at his account of the Nazi massacre at Babi Yar. In this book, Thomas recounts his shock at what he considers calumny. Reference to the hardcover edition of "The White Hotel" shows that he did "gratefully acknowledge the use of material" from Anatoli Kuznetsov's book as he claims, though whether this quite covers the literal transcription of which he was accused remains dubious. The complaint of plagiarism was to be twice repeated, once in relation to his translations of Pushkin's poems and again concerning his account of the Armenian massacres in his novel, "Anar." One is left with the uneasy feeling that, in spite of his brilliant verbal skills, Thomas has not yet achieved the authenticity of a truly personal identity. Although novelists need to be able to identify themselves with a variety of characters, and hence to be less fixed or rigid in personality than average, they also need a firm base from which to view the world. Thomas's lack of inner coherence is reflected in his need to borrow, his expert mimicry, and the episodic, fragmentary quality of his writings.

As in his fiction, sex is treated at length and in considerable detail. Although tormented by sexual curiosity from childhood, he was 19 years old before he discovered how to masturbate. This early dislocation of sexual fantasy from any physical expression of desire may account for what appears to be Thomas's compulsive promiscuity, and the large part that explicit, anatomical sexual detail plays in his writings. As happens with a number of other writers, sex in the head becomes either transient infatuation or sex on paper. For Thomas, as he admits, domesticity and sexual passion are irreconcilable. He tells his analyst: "Passion is vital, and I don't see how it can be reconciled with the familiarity of marriage; the wife washing her husband's socks, the husband seeing his wife in curlers."

Thomas is disarmingly honest about his neurotic symptoms: his phobias of spiders and of flying, his childhood fear of the dark, his proneness to depression and his need to write to stave this off.

Admirers of D.M. Thomas's poetry and novels will find this series of autobiographical sketches both self-revealing and entertaining. I find him a maddeningly wayward writer, but at least he is never dull.

Anthony Storr, a British psychiatrist, is the author of the most recent, "Mistake: A Return to the Self." He wrote this review for The Washington Post.

Dodgers, on Hershiser's 4-Hit, 5-2 Triumph, Win Series in 5 Games

By Michael Martinez
New York Times Service
OAKLAND, California — Regarded as little more than a band of overachievers and underdogs, the Los Angeles Dodgers proved Thursday night that they could win a World Series, four games to one, with heart and Orel Hershiser.

and Mike Davis — who between them hit just three during the regular season — and Hershiser, voted the Series' most valuable player, did the rest. He gave up two singles in the third, then retired 15 of the next 17 batters he faced until the eighth.

The Athletics scored that inning on a single by Stan Javier, who batted in both Oakland's runs, but they left two on base as Jose Canseco popped up and Dave Parker struck out.

As the sky grew darker, so did Oakland's hopes. Storm Davis, the starter and loser in Game 2, faced early trouble and never recovered. He gave up a one-out single to Franklin Stubbs in the first, then served up a home run to one of the unlikeliest of sluggers: Hatcher, who hit one homer in 191 times at bat in the regular season but now had two in 16 times at bat in the Series.

The sudden 2-0 lead marked the third time in five Series games that the Dodgers had scored in the first inning. They had also scored first in four of the five games, and that, as much as anything, but the Athletics, a team known for taking early leads and holding them.

Walt Weiss, whose struggles included a .071 average and one critical error, put down a sacrifice bunt that moved the runners into scoring position. Stan Javier, batting lead-off in his first start, followed with a sacrifice fly to left to score Lansford. But Jose Canseco hit into a fielder's choice to end the inning with two runners on base.

Storm Davis gave up a single to Hatcher to open the fourth, then struck out Mike Marshall, another of the Dodgers' injured, whose back had improved enough to allow him to play. Then Davis struck out John Shelby. But he suddenly wavered, going three and zero to a former Oakland outfielder, Mike Davis, the No. 6 hitter in the Dodgers' order.

Surprisingly, Davis, a .196 hitter this season, was allowed to swing by his manager, Tommy Lasorda. And he made it count, driving the pitch over the fence in right for a 4-1 lead. Davis, who had hit two homers this season, was the designated hitter Thursday only because his team's roster was at a bare-bones minimum as a result of injuries.

Gastineau of the Jets Quits Football; His Fiancée, Nielsen, Has Cancer

By Gerald Eskemazi
New York Times Service
HEMPSTEAD, New York — Mark Gastineau of the New York Jets, one of the National Football League's top pass rushers and a man who has produced his share of surprises, quit football Thursday.

Steve Gutman, the Jets' president, said after practice that Gastineau had quit for "personal reasons, and they're his." "He no longer wants to play football," Gutman said, glumly. Gastineau, the American Conference's sack leader with 7 1/2, had missed Wednesday's practice because of what the club described as an "illness in the family" but was expected back Thursday.

He was virtually responsible for making the quarterback sack an official league statistic. In 1984, he set the league season record, which still stands, with 22. He was selected for the Pro Bowl five times. At 6 feet, 5 inches (1.95 meters) and 270 pounds (122 kilograms), he was one of the fastest defensive linemen in league history.

He was just starting to get the game's respect back and now he walks away," said Marty Lyons, Gastineau's defensive line teammate since the two were chosen as the club's top draft picks of 1979. At dinner the other night, Gastineau described Nielsen as the reason he had decided to stay in football another year.

"After last season I was ready to quit," he said. "But she convinced me that I belonged in football." And in a recent interview, Gastineau added, "If she told me to give it up tomorrow, that's what I'd do." The two met last February. The Danish-born Nielsen is best known to American audiences for her roles in "Beverly Hills Cop II" with Eddie Murphy, and "Rocky IV," which starred her second husband, Sylvester Stallone.

Merely Mickey Hatcher: Captain of the Stuntmen

By Thomas Boswell
Washington Post Service
OAKLAND, California — Once upon a time, in spring training in Vero Beach, Florida, an audacious young player named Mickey Hatcher cut the seat out of the pants of Tommy Lasorda, who just happened to be the manager of the Los Angeles Dodgers.

When you play baseball the way Hatcher does — sliding on your face, slapping singles about and searching for a defensive position where you can hide — playing jokes on the manager might not seem too smart. But Hatcher knows his place. And laughter is part of it. For most of his 10 major league seasons, his position might well have been described as "clown," because aiding team chemistry has been one of his main jobs.

Athletics Puzzled by a Series That Didn't Add Up

By Malcolm Moran
New York Times Service
OAKLAND, California — By every measurement on the field and off, this has been a special baseball season. A franchise that once seemed headed to another town attracted nearly 2.3 million fans. A team that had set the goal of a championship as far ago as spring training was chasing greatness less than a week ago.

And oow? Any definition of greatness, even oowadays, does not include four defeats in the last five games. "We were supposed to be the best team in baseball," said Dennis Eckersley. "And we're not." The fate of the Athletics was determined too gradually to leave much anger. Their shocking offensive limitations were so complete that there was no clear turning point. That was part of what made their defeats almost baffling.

That's hard. Guys feel they have to go out and show people, instead of letting things happen. It's easy to get caught up in that when you know the whole world is watching. Even after the convincing sweep of Boston put the Athletics in the World Series, La Russa knew that the subtleties of the game could have created a different result. He knew the same thing Thursday night.

Even against the mastery of Orel Hershiser, at the climax of a historical stretch of pitching at a decisive point in the season, they did not feel threatened. "I felt comfortable hitting," Mark McGwire said. Five months ago, when the Athletics were building a 13-game winning streak, the T-shirt under McGwire's uniform read "No Mercy."

"I think this is just a perfect example of people coming through that didn't have good years," Eckersley said. "You can take the statistics and blow them up. I'm just glad my last pitch wasn't Kirk Gibson's dagger. I'll tell you that."

"Unfinished business is done," Dave Stewart said. "What else are we going to do? We're not going to go out and play tomorrow for fun. We've got an '89 season oow."

Soviets Said to Release Volkov to NBA

CLEVELAND (AP) — The Soviet Union has granted approval for 6-foot, 8-inch (2-meters) forward Alexander Volkov, a member of its gold-medal Olympic team, to negotiate with NBA teams, a Cleveland-based sports agency said Thursday. Volkov was a sixth-round draft pick of the Atlanta Hawks in 1986.

For the Record

Mike Bell, the defensive end of the Kansas City Chiefs who served a four-month prison term for a cocaine conviction in 1986, has been suspended 30 days by the NFL for violating its substance abuse rule. Reggie Rogers, the Detroit Lions' defensive end, ran a red light before hitting the car in which three teen-agers were killed Thursday, police said.

U.S. federal agents in Denver reported arresting six people and breaking up an international ring that had smuggled about a half-million dollars' worth of steroids into the United States from Mexico in the last five years.

Bulgaria's weight lifting team, pulled from the Olympics after two members tested positive for steroids, is to compete next week in a World Cup event in Cardiff, Wales.

Mark Hayes, Kenny Perry, Lance Ten Broeck, Dan Pilon and rookie Billy Andrade shot six-under-par 66 Thursday to tie for the first-round lead in the Pensacola Open golf tournament in Florida.

David Robinson's request that his active service be reduced so he can play in the NBA this season has been approved by the U.S. Navy.
